Compton Legion Officer
Major George Brokaw Compton, late of the 348th Field Artillery, the first artillery regiment composed of negroes, was elected chairman of the New York County Committee of the American Legion last night. Negro gunners of Major Compton's command originated the famous cry which they shouted each time a 75 was fired: "Kaiser, count your men."

Major Robert McC. Marsh was elected vice-chairman, Captain Joseph

L. Seligman, treasurer, and Sergeant Major George W. Jacques, secretary. The committee fixed 5,000 as the maximum membership of a post in New York County. Already fourteen posts have been formed, some of them being close to maximum.

Lemuel Quigg, Politician and Lawyer, Dead

Began Career As Reporter, Later Went to Congress And Was Big Factor in Republican Circles in N.Y.

Led in Many Campaigns

Undeclared for Many Years, He Went Down Before the Parsons Reform Movement

Lemuel Ely Quigg, for the last twenty-five years a prominent figure in the state Republican organization, an associate in politics of the late Thomas Platt and Thomas Fortune Ryan, and a lawyer of note, died Tuesday night at his home, 435 West End Avenue.

Mr. Quigg was fifty-six years old. For some time he had been a sufferer from Bright's disease, and three months ago he became so seriously ill that he was forced to abandon all his activities.

The son of a country minister, he raised himself by energy and a brilliant mind from the editorship of an obscure paper in Montana, to a post of importance on The Tribune, from which he went to Congress as Representative of the 14th District. Later he became a lawyer and a member of the Republican County Committee, from which he resigned years ago, to devote himself entirely to his profession.

Mr. Quigg led the fight in many political battles and for many years was uniformly successful in the field. His widow and son, Murray Townsend Quigg, a lawyer, who has recently returned from service in France, survive him. The funeral services, which will be private, will be held to-day, interment will be in Flushing.

Later he figured in the frequently recurring political upheavals and investigations attending the traction mania, and subway transactions of the first five or ten years of the present century. It was in the course of one of these, twelve years ago, that he described himself as an "accelerator of public opinion." The phrase "accelerator" thus became famous.

Born in Cecil County, Maryland, February 17, 1863, the son of the Rev. John G. Quigg, a Methodist clergyman with a large congregation and small income, Mr. Quigg had to begin early to make his own way. He was not twenty when he arrived in New York, after having received a common school education at home.

Of nimble wit, with an unusual command of language and a remarkable facility for phrase making, he soon made a mark as a newspaper man. His first job was on "The New York Times." Then for a brief period he owned and edited "The Times" of Flushing, where he married. Afterward he joined the staff of The Tribune.

Made Record As Reporter
While on The Tribune Mr. Quigg covered the Lizzie Borden murder sensation in Massachusetts. He sent to his paper stories of the trial which were regarded as newspaper classics. Cub reporters twenty years later, who never had heard of Quigg, the politician, had heard of Quigg, the writer of the Lizzie Borden stories. And that—to be remembered twenty years for a certain piece of newspaper work—is almost imperishable fame in the newspaper field. He left The Tribune to go to "The New York Press," where he was editor in chief for a short time.

Mr. Quigg's assignments while on the staff of The Tribune included important events of all sorts. If he had a "specialty," it might be said to have been politics, the field of endeavor in which he later became active. In 1889 he made a trip through the Northwest for The Tribune, writing articles concerning the newly admitted states of North and South Dakota, Montana and Washington and the Canadian provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

Meets Russell B. Harrison
During his trip through the Northwest Mr. Quigg made an acquaintance in Helena, Mont., of Thomas H. Carter and Russell B. Harrison, son of President Harrison. Through them he became interested in The Republican, and the friendship with Mr. Carter later was of value politically. Besides writing news articles for The Tribune, Mr. Quigg was for a time an editor. During the first term in Congress he sent dispatches to The Tribune from Washington. In 1892, when the late Whitehall Reade was elected to the Vice-Presidency, Thomas H. Carter was chairman of the Republican National Committee and Mr. Quigg became his assistant, having charge of the publicity work of the committee.

In 1893 Mr. Quigg entered politics with a dash which astounded the wiseacres. A Republican, he was elected to Congress to fill an unexpired term. Representing Congress from 1893 to 1895, he was a Democratic stronghold from time out of mind. He was renominated and defeated the Democratic candidate at the next election by a plurality of nearly 10,000. In 1896 he was re-elected, but resigned his seat to devote his attention exclusively to his duties on "The Press."

Among the measures he advocated successfully in Congress were bills to improve the working conditions of letter carriers and other government employees in this city.

Quit Politics for Law
His vigorous personality won him many enemies as well as many friends, and during his term in Congress some of the former brought charges against him. Mr. Quigg paid money to a representative of the Holland Submarine Boat Company, and that a company seeking mail carry the contract had endeavored to influence him. Both charges were refuted by Mr. Quigg.

Upon his resignation from Congress Mr. Quigg was elected president of the New York State Republican Committee. He was re-elected in 1898 and was credited with persuading the late Colonel Roosevelt to become a candidate for Governor. In 1900 Mr. Quigg forsook politics for the practice of law and was retained by several important public service corporations. In 1905 he made another brief sojourn into the political field and obtained a temporary victory over Benjamin B. Odell, giving way, however, in the following year when Herbert Parsons became head of the county committee.

Before the United States entered the war, Mr. Quigg took occasion to criticize some of the policies of the Allies. But afterward he published a statement that the "mouth of sedition should be shut by a bullet." He espoused the cause of the news editors who refused to handle the publication of William B. Healy. During that period he vigorously assailed Hearst as un-American and on that account dropped from a post he had held for twenty years, the legal staff of the New York Railways Company.

Burial of Dr. Wilkins May Be in 'Poor Ground'

No Funds Available, Although Counsel for Slain Wife Wants Bodies to Rest Together

Special Correspondence
MINEOLA, L. I., July 2.—The body of Dr. Walter K. Wilkins, the convicted wife slayer, who committed suicide here on Sunday night, may be interred in the poorgrounds of the county cemetery at Rockville Center. Thus far no one has come forward to claim the body, which is being held at Cornell's Morgue, Hempstead, and so far as can be ascertained there is no available fund for a funeral.

Corner W. R. Jones to-day said he was unable to determine what action should be taken. He has the $543.31 left by Dr. Wilkins, but explained that under the law he has no authority to use the money to bury the dead physician. Charles R. Wysox, chief of counsel for Dr. Wilkins at his trial, said that Louis G. Friess, former attorney for Mrs. Wilkins, was anxious to have her wish as expressed in the will of 1915, carried out, that Dr. Wilkins be buried with her in Woodlawn Cemetery.

District Attorney Charles Weeks continued his investigation of the suicide to-day with Sheriff Seaman. The authorities are working on the theory that some one inside the jail aided the physician in his suicide, and one suspect is under observation. Warden Hults returned from his vacation to-day and was immediately suspended by Sheriff Seaman pending the investigation.

The State Prison Commission, which was expected here to-day to continue the investigation, has postponed the next session until Tuesday next.
